THE TOXIC CULTURE IS REAL NJ FAITH LEADERS EXPLORE YOUTH ANXIETY By Cynthia Chazen

Faith Leaders, School Administrators, and Non-Profit Leaders working with children met in Paramus last month to discuss the rising rate of mental illness among NJ youth. The Panel, comprised of persons representing different faiths, was led by Reverend David Horst of Central Unitarian Church ; the state's first stigma-free faith community. CUC's Pastoral Care Committee organized the event.

Bergen County's Maureen Kerne, Director of Region V Council for Special Education, stated, "The mental health of kids is presenting now as the greatest concern for NJ educators." All panelists agreed they have seen a rise in mental illness among youth. Educator Mohammed Habehh described the Passaic County Muslim community as "knee-deep" in efforts to better understand mental illness and educate. He shared that they are working furiously in the Islamic Centers to create more resources. Despite this, he told of kids reaching out in secret for mental health services after being stigmatized by their families.

Paula Rozner, Community Outreach Social Worker at Jewish Family Services in Teaneck, said she has seen an increasing number of 10-13 year olds self-harming or expressing suicidality - with a real action plan attached. She hears kids speaking up about cyber bullying, social media and the age-old need to just fit in.

Who, or what can we blame? Technology is at fault, it was agreed, when it replaces human interactions. Every technological exchange is a stand-in for an opportunity to practice social skills and make real connections. And it's enveloping modern kids in a sense of isolation. Jim McCarthy, Principal at St. Peter Academy in River Edge, added the lack of family time and structure that has been with Americans for decades is still churning out "kids starved for family interaction." He stressed peer playtime creates skills such as self-control and decision-making, which he believes are being taken away because parents are over-involved in children's sports and social activities. He sees loneliness among youth as widespread. Antonio Riveras of Comprehensive Behavioral Healthcare, echoed McCarthy's concerns and said he views children's inability to develop social skills as "leading to a lack of frustration tolerance for self and others." He also cited exhausted, low-income parents and the economy as mitigating factors also building up mental illness rates.

Diana Bermudez, Parent Outreach Facilitator at Hackensack H.S, added that the "recent uptick in fear of the government over potential family deportations" is hitting her community - hard! The H.S. reaches out to children of immigrants with offers of counseling. McCarthy noted, "Kids don't know what to make of the current culture."

While the afternoon's panel and subsequent round table discussions may have unearthed more questions than they answered, Reverend Horst summed it by saying "the toxic culture is real," and "it is a scary time to be a kid." Bermudez added, " To help ... we must focus on what we have in common, all faiths share hope for our communities." Maybe Jim McCarthy put it best when he said, "If you're in the business of helping, and you've lasted for some time ... then you must have faith."

TO BE OF SERVICE THE MISSION OF AIR By Cynthia Chazen

Nancy Labov created AIR (Alumni In Recovery), a volunteer, peer-led group focused on substance abuse education, to raise awareness of recovery. Very "out" with her own past struggles, Nancy's experiences intersect: a personal history of drinking and a long service career as a nurse and rehab counselor. Perhaps this led to her oft-cited motto, "To be of service is a cornerstone of recovery."

Nancy grew up with a dysfunctional family; struggling with alcohol, depression, and a sense of shame and isolation. Such stories were way too familiar in the 1970's. She says she was a "major party girl" in high school, and thought little of it until a DWI brought her around to sobriety, aided by her sister, who was also in substance abuse recovery at the time. Nancy has been involved in advocacy ever since.

Mirroring the outcomes of our own Stigma-Free Zone events, Nancy reports AIR programs give participants "permission to talk," and their current offerings give solace and outreach to grieving parents and education to kids grades 7-12. Kids in health classes love the peer-led program and ask thoughtful questions, Nancy reports, on topics as wide-ranging as cannabis legalization and mass incarceration.

I asked Nancy if she sees mental illness as a risk factor for substance abuse. "At AIR, we can't help but address it," she replied, "it's such a chicken and egg thing." She believes anxiety drives addiction, and people self-medicate instead of seeking treatment when they are uneducated about mental illness. Stigma is a big barrier.

To schedule the free, peer-to-peer led AIR program at your school, contact Nancy. They serve Passaic, Essex, Middlesex, and Bergen Counties.
